CHAPTER—The Mist.
Meanwhile Doris, all unconscious of the flurry of comment and conjecture which her passing was arousing on more than one awning-shaded veranda where the town took its iced drinks after a noon siesta, strolled down the elm-bordered street with Alex Munster.

The white satin suit that set off her auburn figure gleamed richly in the sunlight. A white hat sat smartly on her fair well-coiffed hair, and she wore high-heeled white pumps and, despite the warmth of the day, white mousquetaire gloves. To the quiet little town she looked very metropolitan.

Doris felt like a visitant from another world. She tried to look back to the days when she had been a happy, carefree girl and had strolled down the selfsame street under the graceful elms with her girlish school suit.

It seemed to her that the locusts that whirled through the drowsy afternoon hours, the butterflies flitting in the golden sunlight on burnished wings, even the flowers, nodding sedately on their stalks in the well-kept gardens that edged the sidewalk were the same. Only she had changed. She was no longer a part of it all, just as she was not really a part of her husband's world. She had been molded to conform to the latter and she knew that, outwardly, there was no pin point of individuality to differentiate her from the countless other women of that social stratum, but in her heart was the consciousness that she didn't belong. She felt strangely like a man without a country, a soul without its habitat, and the feeling brought her a sense of utter loneliness. She was feeling her way through darkness which she could not penetrate, the way had closed behind her, and there was no light as yet in the distance ahead.

"Why are you so pensive, Doris?" asked Munster finally. "I asked you to come for a stroll to get you away from a heart-to-heart talk, and you lapse into complete silence before we've gone a block. It's only a short way more to the garage and if that damned—beg pardon—damned tire is fixed, I'll have the car out in a jiffy."

"I don't want to drive," protested Doris. "Let's play we're about five years younger and go to skitter on the drug store for a soda and then stroll down to the lake and sit on the grass."

"In that rig?" with a glance at her immaculate white ensemble. "Oh, this," Doris glanced down at her costume and made a little grimace; last year's fashions, my dear."

"Gosh!" ejaculated Alex feelingly and with awe. "If you look like that in last year's gown, what would you do to us susceptible small-town boys in the latest fashion?" Doris laughed softly.

"I do believe you're trying to make love to me," she said, giving him a provocative glance worthy of the old Doris.

"I would in a minute," returned Alex quietly. "If my heart weren't given elsewhere."

Doris became serious instantly. "Won't Lila see you at all?" He shook his head, staring gloomily down at the brick wall that stretched its ruddy length before them.

"To all my pleading letters she makes the same reply. Please let me try to find myself alone!"

"She had a frightful shock. You must be patient with her," urged Doris. "When I go North I am to spend a few days with her at the seashore, where she has been ever since her husband's death. I'll do what I can."

"You're a brick," declared Munster feelingly. "Try to make her see me. She's just become morbid about things, I believe, and if I could see her and talk to her, I feel confident I can reverse her mood. I say, with all reverence and thankfulness, that Lila cared for me once, and she is not the type that forgets easily."

"It must be the making of her," mused Doris. "She is away from her mother's unnatural influence."

"But think of the poor girl trying to make a go of it alone when she's never permitted to stand on her own feet in her life," Alex replied gloomily. "It's just about as pathetic as a little Chinese girl with bound feet starting on a twenty-mile hike."

"I'll do the best I can for you," Doris promised again, and she felt more than repaid by Alex's grateful look.

BOOSTERS' TRIP BEGINS TONIGHT

Merchants and Manufacturers' Association Go on Annual Outing.

FUN IS THE KEYNOTE
Plans of Entertainment and Stops En Route Not Divulged.

With one of the jazziest bands of Washington blaring its ear-piercing notes out of every porthole, the steamer Three Rivers will leave her dock at Water and L streets southwest, at 6 o'clock tonight, carrying the boosters of the Merchants and Manufacturers' Association on their fifth booster outing by boat.

There are only two facts known about the trip. One is that the boat will start at 6 o'clock and that she will dock at Baltimore, Md., at or about 5 o'clock Monday morning. Those in charge of the trip have every plan sealed up so tight that not even Philip King, president of the association, can tell what's going to happen down the river.

Day and Two Nights of Fun.
It will be a day and two nights of all kinds of fun, both ashore and afloat, for the Three Rivers will make many stops en route to spread the slogan of "Buy in and boost for Washington." The populace at the landings touched will be encouraged to participate in many of the stunts planned by J. Maxon Cunningham and his committee on "stunts," and a large number of prizes have been donated by the winners of the various events.

The entire membership of the House and Senate District Committees have been invited to be the guests of the Boosters on this trip. Several of them have accepted.

Assemble at Dock.
The boosters will forego their regular pre-morning parade this year and will assemble at the dock of the steamer.

Immediately after dinner aboard the proceedings will be turned over to the "stunts" committee and the fun will begin to continue until the steamer ends her voyage at Baltimore.

All Sunday the vessel will stop at various river landings on both sides of the Potomac.

DORSCH'S WHITE CROSS BAKERY

BE ATTENTIVE TO WOMEN YOU LOVE, ALWAYS SHOW THEM COURTESIES, MODERN BLUEBEARD ADVISES MEN

Los Angeles, May 7.—Charles Newton Harvey, bigamist and murderer, who will hereafter be known on the official records as James P. Watson, won the affections of his women by being especially attentive and courteous and by paying especial attention to the little things nearest a woman's heart.

In his personal effects, said the authorities, Watson carried memoranda relating to every woman he had married and to many whom he evidently had on his list as prospective. In these notes he had each classified as to her likes and dislikes, the amount of money she had, her type generally, whether she was a working girl and other data which might prove of value to him in the future.

Added to this written memoranda the superb bigamist carried in his head a particular formula which he adopted in reference to womankind as a whole. From his own statements it is evident that he lived up to his rule and by so doing was attractive to women.

"Observe the little courtesies of life which so many of us are prone to ignore."

According to Watson's theories there is one thing the feminine mind can never forgive or forget and that is inattention. Watson was attentive. He saw to it that his lady friends were remembered with some present upon their birthday. Thus they were sure to be more than satisfied and gave him credit for special thoughtfulness. When he planned to be absent for a period of time he always left a note.

riod flowers formed a part of his many remembrances. On the streets, in cafes or other public places Watson was gallantly personified. His code provided that the lady he was escorting must realize that she was attractive and much to be desired. By subtle statements and direct compliments he played on their feelings.

"Never fail to let a woman know that you are proud of her—that every man should be and is envious," was part of his ritual.
